The following Poem is an attempt to delineate and expose the eccentricities of a country whose sudden rise and progress have no parallel in the world's history; and, in the many allusions to them, the author would remark that none are intended as personal, but, on the contrary, mere outlines of events, transpiring during the first period of California, under a new and alien system of government.

INTRODUCTION.

When Roman zeal had forced its way and gained A footing on the western shore, and when Brave souls to raise the cross and spread their faith Within a savage land had risked their lives—

'T was then a place was sought their patron saint To dedicate. A spacious bay inclosed
By fertile lands, whose hills and vales were stored With wondrous wealth, through which bright rivers roll'd

And spread their golden sands o'er all the plains Around. The woods and glens were rife with game,

And there the wily Indian roamed, to chase
The deer, or there the grizzly bear to hunt And fearless slay. Oft to some rude steep he Climb'd, and ling'ring on the lofty height, hailed There with joy the scene that lay beneath. But Ah ! a frown his swarthy brow did cross, when

On a gentle mound his piercing eye did Rest, near which at work some zealous priests the Pathless woods were felling, and where clusters
Of the savage tribes were busy too, a Place to clear, that there they might a Christian Temple build and elevate the cross. For Rapid strides the Fathers made, and daily
To their righteous fold did many converts Gain. Along the hills and neighb'ring shores were

Other stations, and at every one, they Prospered well; whilst here and there, the gardens

Green and cultured fields that might be seen, gave

Ample proof of how the Fathers lived. The Warrior too, gave sterling aid, and arm'd With buckler, pike and blade, protection gave,
As briskly on, the conquest went, for Priest
And Soldier, both, would save the savage soul.

P R E A M B L E I .

One eve, as I rambled, not far from the city,
A poor woman I happened to meet ;
Who said to me sadly, " Good sir, pray have pity,
And quick give me relief I entreat.

“ Since the morn’s early dawn, in vain I’ve sought food,
To keep my starved children from crying,
A trifle from you sir, will do the babes good,
And save them most surely from dying.”

“ Then haste thee, good mother,” I said,
“ and be fleet,”
As I pressed in her hand a gold coin ;
“ With this ye can buy them abundance to eat,
So away, thy young starvelings to join.”

Resuming my ramble, so sadly suspended,
She said, "Stay, I have something for thee ;
For kindness like thine to those thus befriended,
A requital should have, sir, from me.

"Accept then this optic, its mystical sight,
Will the past like the present display,
And things that have perished will bring back to light, Though to mem'ry long faded away."

So homeward I hurried, o'erjoyed at the thought That now I could fathom my neighbor ;
A test was soon made on a knave whom I sought Whose faults were exposed without labor.

And bound now to visit the great growing North,
Where the sages had built a large village ;
I packed up my treasure with which I set forth,
To discover their scheming and pillage.

A few days at sea brings us close to the scene Where swift up the bay we are gliding ;
The current moves rapid, the wind it blows keen,
And soon, we at anchor are riding.

Now, Ho ! for a peep at the great golden city,
And I raise the charmed gift to my eye ;
But what do I see? Oh, great God, in thy pity,
Pray forgive all the faults I descry !

Aloft, e'en above the high telegraph peak,
Amid clouds of bright silver and gold ;
An eaglet doth soar, with this scroll in her beak:
Here both Justice and Conscience are sold.

More central is seen the fair Goddess of Fame,
Her eyes glaring wild and in ire ;
A book lies before her—she points to its name,
'T is written in letters of fire—

SAN FRANCISCO.

CANTO I.

Two rapid streams from ages known,¹
That in their course conjoined had grown,
 The legends tell;
And flowing on, o'er vast domains,
Through flowery meads and grassy plains,
 A lake did swell.

Whence bursting o'er its rocky bound,
Their ceaseless flow bold egress found,
 Thus fresh and fair;
To sportive join the briny deep,
Therein to rage, or there to sleep
 With waveless care.

And flowing on, still swift they ran,
E'er deep'ning where their breach began Its shallow strait;
Till by their flow was oped a way,
Disclosing now a spacious bay,
 In pristine state.

Where 't was that came in after years,²
That holy band of Pioneers,
 Of whom we read;
Whose active zeal did thousands win
From Pagan rites and Pagan sin
 To Rome's fair creed.

And once a year a gallant sail,
From Castile's shore, with Royal mail,
 Then cheered the port;
Where safely moored, for months she lay,
Dispensing out, from day to day,
 The aid she brought.

But not till Spain's proud sway was o'er,³ Did other ships these wilds explore,
Or traffic here ;
And then so rare that they appeared,
Whene'er one came, 't was gladly cheered, E'en far and near.

When in a nook that sheltered lay,
Called "Yerba Buena," in its day,
The anch'rage ground ;
Were bartered off the wares she brought,
In change for product found in port,
At posts around.

And thus it was, those early days,
Gave little else of note to praise,
From year to year ;
Unless, perchance, some new-raised cot,
Or rustic cross, on some lone spot,
The way to cheer.

Yet many an inroad had been made,
Ere progress dared to lift the shade
 Where darkness lay ;
And then the task a hero braved,
As step by step, he boldly paved
 The cultured way.

A gallant Swiss, whose love of fame,⁴ Bestowed "Helvetia's" classic name
 On those broad lands ;
Where he, so long, had chieftain been,
And where e'en now, his home is seen,
 And sightly stands.

At length a war with neighb'ring foes,⁵ Brought with it all the ills and woes
 That cause dismay ;
When changed the scene before so bright,
For all its charms of old took flight,
 And passed away.

But haply here the strife was short,
For ships of war besieged the fort,
 Within the bay ;
When all its posts, on either side, Submissive bowed, with humbled pride,
 To alien sway.

And so, the foe, now sovereign here,
His laws proclaimed, afar and near,
 Throughout the land ;
O'er which waved free, from many a height,
The emblem of his country's right,
 Long there to stand.

From which events we justly date,
The magic rise of this our State,
 To rank and name ;
That in this bold, progressive age,
Takes signal part on history's page,
 Indeed, of fame.

For as progression forced its way,
To lands yet rude, o'er which held sway,
 A supine race ;
Its active march to light revealed
A golden tract, till now concealed,
 Of wondrous space.

Which news soon spread afar and wide,
Till freely told on every side,
 In statements rare ,
That as they went, so wild they grew,
Their glowing tales the eager drew,
 To grasp a share.

For thus allured with hope of gain,
Their thousands formed a living chain,
 O'er land and sea ;
Whose thoughts by day, and dreams by night,
Of "El Dorado" visions bright,
 Gave joy and glee.

For gold it was, they frantic sought,
And 't was for gold the seas they fought,
And tempests scorned ;
God only knows the victims dead,
Whose forms bestrew the ocean bed, Perchance unmourned !

Yet many a ship in triumph brought Her living cargo safe to port,
For transit here,
And truly 't was a treat to see,
These Argonauts on shore, set free,
So full of cheer.

Indeed, in fleets they crossed our Gate,
Each gallant bark replete with freight,
Of product rare ;
More prized than gems of precious gold,
For freights they were of freemen bold,
And matrons fair.

That soon the barren hills made gay,
With thousands there, at work or play,
 From morn till night ;
Whose armed display and tents around,
Had semblance to some battle-ground,
 Or fortress height.

Whence now embarked they went in bands,
To seek, betimes, the golden lands,
 Yet far away ;
And 't was indeed a merry sight,
To see them off, with hopes so bright,
 And hearts so gay.

The Sharp, howe'er, saw golden cheer,
In daily schemes of profit here,
 For him to rule ;
And soon to work his wits he set,
That he might draw within his net,
 Some pliant tool.

The Merchant, too, remained behind,
A shelter for his wares to find,
And give them care ;
For merchandise that came to hand,
And lay exposed upon the strand,
Had perished there !

The Landlord, too, thought best to stay,
And in his own peculiar way,
Do service here ;
Preparing homes with special care,
For those who sought his humble fare,
And promised cheer.

The Lawyer, though, bright visions saw,
In counsel fees, and suits at law,
That promised pay ;
And so to anchor quickly came,
To reap his share of all such game,
That came in play.

The Court House then on "Portsmouth Square," Was oft the scene of judgments rare,
 And quaint decrees ;
And who doth not recall the way
The merchant service had to pay,
 Its fines and fees ?

For scarce a ship that reached the port,
But brought some knave who soon was sought
 A claim to make ;
And then divide the plunder got,
With him, who was the wily sot,
 The suit to take.

That tiny, dingy, loathsome Court !
'T was there the steamships first were sought,
 As legal prey ;
And dearly did their agent bleed,
To pay the sums the Court decreed
 To give away.

The Gamester, too, from choice remained,
Whose moral scruples ne'er restrained,
His love for play ;
Nor luring to some modern hell,
The simple youth, who ever fell,
An easy prey.

For all such dens, now served with care,
Adorned with gaudy trappings rare,
The weak allured ;
And he, who ventured there to look,
Was trolled along to take the hook,
And then secured.

What glaring sights were seen around,
When, in each street, the idler found A place like this !
When games of chance, and music too,
So charmed the crowds that thither drew,
They thought it bliss.

At night, as one the streets did pace,
He saw, what seemed in every place,
 Some magic spell;
Where there the charms of song and dance,
That so the joys of life enhance,
 Did freely dwell.

And other scenes were blithe and gay,
Where tipplers passed their time away,
 Like sots of old;
And sat and talked morn, noon and night,
Of startling deeds, and bloody fight,
 For lust of gold.

The Parson, too, resolved to stay,
But not fair maid to give away,
 Oh, no indeed!
For maidens then were scarce, I ween,
And, in the town, too rarely seen,
 Such aid to need.

He tarried here, in hope, forsooth,
To lure some stray'd and fallen youth,
 From sin to prayer ;
And carry back to other days
His thoughts of home and early ways,
 When bright and fair.

The Doctor, too, attractions saw,
And, like the trickster of the law,
 Beheld his prey ;
For soon the miner, sore displeased,
Came limping from the mines, diseased,
 With means to pay.

And thus, a harvest, rich indeed,
Came pouring in, whilst hearts did bleed
 For friends of old ;
For brothers, or some other kin,
Who victims fell, to worldly sin
 Of lust for gold.

The graveyard then, o'er North Beach hill, Betrayed the march of many an ill,
 From day to day ;
Whose grassy mounds the numbers told,
Of those, alas ! both young and old,
 That pass'd away.

Thus hoary Time, his transit sped,
And though fond hearts too oft had bled
 At scenes like these,
The State at large had much to cheer,
For Mammon cast his treasure here,
 The world to please.

And though its millions passed away
To other shores, from day to day,
 In virgin gold ;
They did not drain these staunch domains,
So rich were all the hills and plains
 With wealth untold.

The Sages, wild at these extremes,
Began reform in all their schemes,
Without delay ;
And soon proposed their acts to crown,
By special change from chartered town
To city sway.

When they, who held the public weal,
Did from the public eye conceal Their knavish plans ;
By sales of lands and contracts, too,
'Mong those ycleped the chosen few
Of favored clans.

But this, howe'er, was nothing new,
For oft the town had done so, too,
In early days ;
Though then esteemed of minor spoil,
And did not friends and foes embroil
In wrangling frays.

But where bold speculation laid,
Was in the sales by Sheriff made,
Of public land ;
To pay a judgment gained in law
By Peter Smith, who quickly saw
The game on hand.

In sorry truth, sin grew apace,
And sowed its seeds in every place,
To feast thereon ;
The city seeming all fair game,
For every one of vicious fame
To prey upon.

It was, indeed, a "Botany Bay"
Of convict rogues, skilled every way .
In fearful crime ;
Whose hellish scenes of dreadful fire,
And murder, too, that did transpire,
Gave test in time.

The people roused at length, to ire,⁶ Resolved these fiends should hence retire,
 By force of arms ;
And formed at once, a gallant band,
Each member sworn to rid the land
 Of all such harms.

And well they kept their oaths, forsooth,
For prompt the rogues in every booth
 Were made secure ;
When one bold stroke on "Portsmouth Square,"
A hanging matter, did declare Their vengeance sure.

But, truly, 't was a sight most sad,
To thus behold a crowd, half-mad
 Gloat o'er its foe ;
But who can say the course pursued
Had not at least its moral good, Though crowned with woe !

A few such chast'nings spread alarm,
For soon the culprits fled from harm
 By land and sea ;
And through the State, the issue proved A sovereign check, where treason moved,
 That left it free.

And now, triumphant over crime,
These guardsmen brave have left to time
 To solve their acts ;
And, in disbanding, each has placed
The part he took, to be retraced,
 And judged from facts.

P R E A M B L E I I .

A boat was now waiting, to take us on shore,
With our luggage already therein ;
So quickly we followed, the town to explore,
And in haste the grand work to begin.

On landing we rode to the nearest hotel,
O'er a sadly conditioned, rude pier ;
Whose planking was such though we passed o'er it well,
As to cause us, with reason, much fear.

For every few paces a hole was passed by,
Yawning wide to the waters below,
Where many a victim had drawn his last sigh,
As o'er him the current did flow.

The avenues, too, were quite out of repair,
So that jolting, we went all the way ;
Till reaching our lodgings, we paid the coach fare,
And alighted without more delay.

The famous "Tehama"! Yes, this was the place, Whose lessee, Master Frink, at the door,
A welcome there gave us, with smiling good grace,
And a room on the second flight floor.

This earthquake proof mansion as oft it was named,
Had escaped all the ravage
of fire,
Whose model was such as to make it most famed
Of all others, when one did retire.

Its windows were low, and a fine balustrade Encircled the building around ;
From whence one with ease, o'er a light palisade,
Could escape by a leap to the ground.

But the time has gone by for this kind of fear
No longer such dangers alarm ;
The fireman is prompt, and treats with a jeer
Every risk, so he saves us from harm.

In fact, this Department, effective and true,
Was made up from the bloods of the town ;
Who for boldness of tact, and cleverness, too, Have maintained far and near a renown.

With this just admission, we pensive lay down,
 To reflect on the whims of the day ;
And wondered if strangers that visit
 the town,
 Have observed, as we have, its decay.

Its growth was too rapid, it merged in a day,
 As it spread o'er the hillocks
 around,
And so will it vanish as quickly
 away, Until naught shall be left but a mound.

Which fate the rude Indian doth sadly foreshow,
When relating his legend of old ;
How a city would rise from regions
below,
And a sacrifice fall to its gold.

Five times has it happened, the omen
't is plain,
When destruction by fire ensued ;
But, Phoenix-like, rising to power again,
The calamity may be renewed.

Come when it will come, there is hope for it left,
And a chance the sad presage to foil ;
Though deep are the wounds which disaster has cleft,
Yet it still may long prosper by toil.

Then courage, Franciscans ! On ye it depends,
Let misfortune come oft as it will ;
Be honesty thine, howsoe'er the tide wends
So that thus ye may yet triumph still.

The night passing o'er, we made haste now to test
The effect of our glass from the street ;
And took for our station, the point judged the best,
Where "Montgom'ry" with "Jackson" doth meet.

CANTO II.

Behold the Past! There where you stand
The water rose at God's command,
And bathed the shore.

Whence gentle springs, and streamlets fair
From out the gathered sand dunes there,
Did freely pour.

And on your right, where yet is seen
The drama's once grand palace queen,
A lakelet stood,
In which the wild-fowl oft did play,
When blustering winds swept o'er the bay,
In angry mood.

And where Commercial cuts your street ⁷
A mansion stood of frame complete And model fit ;
Whose halls oft rang with music's strain,
In love-told song, or sweet refrain,
 With frequent wit.

Its mistress then, a charming dame
Had far and near, reputed fame
 For grace and pride ;
Who, queen-like, at the festive board,
Oft joined her friends and true liege lord,
 To there preside.

It was the primal fabric then,
To cheer this lonely sea-side glen,
 So famed of yore ;
And mem'ry dear must first decay,
E'er charms so prized shall pass away,
 To charm no more.

And further on, a square, we 'll say,⁸ Where California spans the way
 Was Leidesdorff's pride ;
A tiny cottage, plain and neat,
And fairest gem that one could meet
 Then, far and wide.

With garden-plot of flowers rare,
Kept ever bright and ever fair
 By clever skill ;
From whence, abruptly, shooting rose
And brought Montgom'ry to its close,
 A sandy hill.

And when the rich discovered ore,
So many lured to seek the shore,
 Then Leidesdorff died.
But soon a kind successor came,
Whose friendly acts endeared his name
 On every side.

For who did not regard the man,⁹ When first the tidal wave began Its influx here ;
Who unto all, that sought his aid
A kind and generous hand displayed,
 With friendly cheer.

And when a project was begun
To build a church, and have it done
 Without delay ;
A school, or lodge, for any good,
'T was he, who ever foremost stood,
 To aid the way.

This tribute then, we deem in place,
For in the city's weal, we trace,
 His helping hand ;
That in the State's grand progress, too,
The part it took, and had to do,
 Will brightly stand.

And now, that bold aggressive war,
No longer vexed this western shore,
 By sea or land ;
The powers at home, proposed a scheme,
To have each month, a mail by steam
 At their command.

But hard it was, to find the man
Of soul so great, to risk a plan,
 That naught assured ;
And not till Gotham's son came forth,¹⁰
The princely merchant of the North,
 Was it secured.

When, thro' his zeal, prompt means were wrought, Whereby, to reach this idol Port
 And golden land ;
Where thousands now are here to-day,
Who 'd not been here, but for the way
 Oped by his hand.

For which they laud him as their friend,
For which the world will e'er commend His vent'rous act ;
And when we praise him for it here,
We 'll hail him as the Pioneer
 In truth and fact.

But let us turn to other scenes
Where progress now has scarce left means Amidst our rise, ,
To trace the lines of by-gone days—
With all their charms, and social ways,
 Save memory's ties.

There, on your left, upon the strand
Amid the piles of drifted sand,
 That strewed the shore.
A warehouse stood, that in its day,
Was justly called, we well may say,
 A model store.

Where rolled the tides, so near its base
They scarcely left a foot-path space Along its side ;
Which, when blocked up, as often seen,
Gave no spare room to pass between
 The house and tide.

Oft then a launch lay near the shore,
In hailing distance from the store
 The flood to wait ;
And when enabled by the tide
She, from the very warehouse side, Embarked her freight.

For then the Steamship's Agent, made This famous spot, for truck and trade
 His business place ;
Where now, upon the very spot
An iron warehouse fills the lot With comely grace.

'T was oft the scene of many a strife
'Twixt parties, who, with rudeness rife Enforced their way ;
To be the first to make secure A homeward passage doubly sure
 For steamer day—

And though it stood upon the shore
A lone attraction, as before The rapid change ;
'T is now the centre of the town,
And hid by structures of renown
 That round it range.

Still further on, a space beyond
Where once was seen a shallow pond,
 Stood Leidesdorff's store ;
From whence ran out a puny pier,
The first that graced the landing here
 Before the war—

The searching eye met nothing more Along this unfrequented shore,
 So bleak and bare ;
Till "Rincon Point" its craggy bluff Projected out with boldness rough,
 And visage rare.

Unless it were the "Happy Vale,"
That sheltered from the frequent gale,
 Was Cupid's pride ;
Whose groves and walks from day to day,
Were ever thronged with lovers gay
 From far and wide.

For there, the trees and shrubs so green
With foliage rich as e'er was seen In Paradise ;
And flowers, too, of brilliant hue
That fostered by the morning dew, Did odors rise.

And made it thus a haunt for love,
Whilst Nature there, the cooing dove
 In pairs had sent ;
That by their plaintive notes so rare
They might the hallowed place declare When Love there went.

It was for festive sports the spot, Where many a crowd its surfeit got,
 Of joy and glee ;
As there they chased dull care away,
From early morn till close of day,
 So light and free.

And now, behold, upon your right, Near "Simes's Bank," friend Nathan's site,"
 A grassy mound ;
Where stood his house, his mill and store,
With little garden, too, before,
 All fenced around.

And further on, where now doth run
The street called "Clay," then just begun, Lived Vioget,¹²
Whose fancy cottage and saloon
Were ever crowded, morn and noon,
For billiard play.

The "Custom House" and "Town Hotel," Remain for us to state how well
Their fate they bore ;
And how they stood, preserved with care,
For years the pride of "Portsmouth Square,"
As gems of yore.

A few more buildings scattered round,
Upon this "Yerba Buena" ground,
Made up the town ;
And near North Beach we yet may find,
The last memento of its kind,
In lone renown.¹³

PREAMBLE III.

With a parting adieu to the bright golden town,

And its fêtes that so endless abound ;

We embark on a steamer, whose name and renown,

Have extended indeed the world round.

For who but remembers the "Senator's" fame,
And éclat for the fortune she won
When, with crowded saloon, and deck too, the same,
She up toward the gold region run.

The harvests she gathered were bright yellow gold,
Quite enriching her owners indeed ;
As o'er the broad basin she gallantly roll'd,
And traversed the river with speed.

And now, though no longer the river she plies,
But o'er the blue waters doth run ;
Yet still her rich harvests continue to rise,
And add to the piles she has won.

So, steaming away, we soon traverse the bar,
Gliding on o'er the billows so gay ;
Till point after point receding afar, Brings us close to the end of the day.

At length the green hills of Point Pinos appear,
Rising up like a cloud from the deep ;
And ere the sun setting, we hail with a cheer,
Its blanch dunes, where the wild surges leap.

MONTEREY.

CANTO III.

The pine clad hills of Monterey, Behold them in their vestment gay,
 Of beauty rare ;
There soaring upward toward the skies,
In matchless grandeur as they rise,
 So bright and fair !

Yet ah ! how sad to see them harmed,
And so despoiled of all that charmed
 The raptured gaze ;
When forests dense their summits crown'd,
And spread their foliage thick around,
 In one dark maze.

Not e'en their beauty could them save,
Nor all the prayers true homage gave,
 To have them spared ;
Nor threats of law, nor Lynch alarm,
Could have effect to stay the harm
 The spoiler dared.

He hearkened not, he heeded not,
But hewed away from spot to spot,
 With laughing scorn ;
Proclaiming as he bent his way,
“ For this our Government did pay Ye Greasers born ! ”

And so, good “ Uncle Sam ” became A cloak for crime, though not to blame For such misdeed ;
Whilst here and there, the squatter, too,
Did chuckling sneer, and pay his due,
 With self-same plead.

In truth 't was thus throughout the State,
With waggish rogues, who caught the bait,
 As "Sam's true kin ;"
As on they went, these rightful heirs, Whate'er they craved, proclaiming theirs,
 For 't was no sin.

But let us leave this brigand scene,
For one more staid and pure, I ween,
 Of days gone by ;
When peace and plenty bless'd the land,
And hearts content went hand in hand,
 With scarce a sigh.

For in those days it was that came,
Those goodly men of pious fame,
 To teach the way ;
When yet the woods and hills around,
With wild beasts' howl did loud resound,
 Both night and day.

When oft-times then, old grizzly made His seaside stroll, to dauntless wade
 Within the sea ;
Or feast upon some carcass there,
Of stranded whale, or some such fare,
 That there might be.

When at noonday he'd plunge the wave,
The stormy billows fierce to brave,
 The old folks say ;
And dashing through them gain the shore,
Where habit led him, oft before,
 In quest of prey.

Beyond these scenes we thus portray,
Which form the outskirts of the bay,
 A ruin lies ;
Of rough-hewn stone, whose relics tell
Its once proud state, and also, well
 The spot describes.

It is a charming place, and proves
That he who lived there liked its groves,
And had good taste ;
For search the region all around,
Another spot could scarce be found
So truly chaste.

'T was there progression first appeared.
That paved the way which culture cheered In after age ;
And many a relic must decay,
Ere all its charms be swept away,
From Nature's page.

The little Church, so lonely left,
Though now, by Time, of much bereft,
That gave it life ;
Yet proudly stands a monument
To those whose lives were freely lent
In days of strife.

In primal times a martial square
Did shield its shrine from outward care
 And hostile fear ;
When clank of arms and rolling drum,
With piercing fife and warriors' hum,
 Gave constant cheer.

For many a Spanish hero, then,
With half a thousand loyal men,
 Did guard its walls ;
When scarce a day, but joy and glee,
Its hours would end, with hearts so free,
 In routs and balls.

With music too ! the light guitar,
That gently touched, was dearer far,
 By maiden's hand ;
Whose silvered voice, in alto clear,
Revealed sweet love in strains most dear,
 From Castile's land.

Thus briskly time did pass away,
Forever free and ever gay,
 With song and dance ;
For naught but pleasure then did reign,
Whilst love of home, and faith to Spain,
 Did joy enhance.

And though but slow the town progressed,
It here and there, at length possessed
 Some thriving spots ;
Yet scattered so upon the green,
Their cosy huts were faintly seen,
 Like little dots.

But, strange to say, not one betrayed
The slightest taste for floral aid,
 Their grounds to charm ;
For scarce a tree or shrub was there,
Save nature's growth, that void of care,
 Had 'scaped from harm.

And so it was, till other hands
Had come afar, from distant lands,
 These dearths to share ;
When soon a thriving garden plot,
Made bright each comer's homestead lot,
 With flowers rare.

But see where now so sightly stands
Yon rustic mound, whose site commands
 The town and bay ;
Where once the Royal Standard waved,
And where bold valor fearless braved,
 The savage fray.

For 't was the fortress in its day,
Erected there to guard the way,
 To Christian light ;
And long it did a shelter yield,
To those who then the cross did wield
 For ends so bright.

But more remote its cannon drove,
A private squadron from the cove,¹⁴
 Where they would land ;
Repelling prompt their bold attack,
With such effect that forced them back,
 To join their band.

And though their bark seemed much impaired,
They put to sea, and boldly dared,
 To risk the main ;
Full eager, too, to leave to spot,
Where pluck and skill had foiled their plot,
 And hope for gain.

Since which grand feat, so val'rous won,
Its rampart scarce has fired a gun,
 Save when for sport ;
Or sign to guide some lonely bark,
That sought at night, when late and dark,
 To gain the port.

Unless we cite rebellion's feat,
When fierce incensed to warlike heat
 The Creole rose ;
And ere the town its slumbers raised,
The fortress seized, and from it blazed Upon their foes.

A spacious lawn that cheers the bank,
Reveals the spot where many a prank Full pleasure won ;
Where oft the merienda bade
Both old and young, of every grade,
 To join its fun.

At which they danced and sang away,
With mirthful glee and sportive play,
 Till day had ceased ;
While not a soul of social heart,
Who in the merry fête took part,
 But seemed well pleased.

E'en now, as then, the grounds remain,
With many a wreck that long hath lain Strewed o'er the shore ;
Of odds and ends of divers kind,
Which all so freely bring to mind,
 Those freaks of yore.

But ah ! there's yet a dearer spot,
Which no true hearts hath yet forgot,
 That claims our pen ;
To tell how there a Patriarch Doth lie entomb'd, without a mark,
 The place to ken.

It is the one o'er yonder hill,
Where many a trace remaineth still Of auld lang syne ;
Where once the jolly Friar laughed
With full content, as pleased he quaffed
 His ruby wine.

This ancient site, or Mission post,
So long attractive on the coast,
Still holds its spell ;
For there the sainted "Serra" lies,¹⁵
And many a Father, good and wise,
Of whom they tell ;

Whom oft historic pages praise
As men who did their voices raise In holy pride ;
Whose works and acts the critic ne'er,
We hope, will dare to treat unfair
Or aught deride.

Go ask the aged Creole now
How fared he, when, with lowly bow,
He craved their aid ;
And hear him say, with downcast look,
"*Though richer now, I'd rather brook
The needy jade !*"

Go ask the voyager how he bore
The rugged pastime then on shore,
And hear his voice :
“ *Though now there’s comfort all around,
To have it, as it then was found,
Would be my choice !*”

P R E A M B L E I V .

Resounding aloud from the hills that arise
O'er the scene which encircles
the bay,
Booms the peal of a cannon, whose re-echo dies,
Like a thunder-clap rolling its way.

'Tis the signal for parting — our labor is done ;
The ship's anchor hangs fast to her side ;
So it's ho ! for the ocean again now to run,
And on its proud billows to ride.

Swift onward we journey, enjoying the night,
Now so placid, so gentle and free,
That scarce a white ripple appears to the sight,
So smooth is the beauteous sea.

When morning appears, we are close to the shore, Rolling swiftly along, blithe and gay ;
Till at length "Point Concepcion" abaft us soon bore,
And its vision fast fading away.

Anon, we beheld o'er the caps of the land,
That precede the first glimpse of a town,
Two lofty church towers, whose aspect,
so grand,
Quite betokened a place of renown.

But distance, we find, on arriving, had given An enchantment indeed to the view ;
For, instead of a city, with kirks to enliven, E'en the houses were scattered and few.

SANTA BARBARA.

CANTO IV.

Yon mountain range that soars on high,¹⁶
Whose towering peaks salute the sky
 In Alps-like form ;
Did Fremont pass, one darksome night,
And brave the dangers of its height
 'Mid howling storm.

When down the bold and cragged steep
His gallant steeds did wildly leap O'er cleft and rock ;
And crushed to death were piled up found A frightful heap and ghastly mound,
 The sight to shock.

And oh ! what tales of blood are told,
Of murder there, most foul and bold,
 By villain done,
For vengeance, or for paltry gain,
That, to recount, would render pain
 To more than one.

For many a victim there doth lay,
Now mould'ring in his home of clay,
 Whose fate is hid ;
Whilst here, within the very town,
His slayer stalks with fearless frown,
 The crowd amid.

Yet brighter scenes the landscape shows,
More genial, too, good Heaven knows,
 The heart to cheer ;
That bring to mind those blissful days,
Of by-gone times and guileless ways,
 To memory dear.

Behold, where yon lone Mission stands,
Amidst its hills and rolling lands,
 So stately seen ;
Whose crumbling relics, scattered round,
Evince that once 't was thriving found,
 And rich hath been.

And see its thrifty gardens, too,
With flowing fountains, pure as dew,
 And works of art ;
And stony church, whose walls within,
So hang with scenes depicting sin,
 They daunt the heart.

Fit scenes, indeed, the savage mind
To tantalize, and firmly bind
 To moral acts ;
For clearly thus, it sees portrayed
The end of sin, by art displayed,
 Like glaring facts.

And now, behold, all bright to view,
The little town, and fortress, too,
 Half hid by trees ;
With here and there a gaysome spot,
Of garden fair, or verdant plot,
 To cheer and please.

The buildings, few and far between,
Though low, present a comely mien,
 When seen aloof ;
Whose milk-white walls made still more fair,
In contrast with the ruddy glare
 Of each tiled roof.

And on the strand what sights we see,
In rompish scenes of joy and glee,
 With mirthful play ;
Where boatmen toil with jolly song,
And lift their voices loud and strong,
 So blithe and gay.

Indeed, 't was once a merry sight
To watch their pranks from morn till night,
 So full of charm ;
As through the surf they burdens bore,
And placed them safe upon the shore,
 E'er free from harm.

This busy spot the Indian sought,
And often here his offspring brought,
 In days when free ;
To brave the waves in sportive play,
Or boldly dare, with hearts e'er gay,
 The ruffled sea.

And often, too, he would resort
To where then stood the barrack fort,
 To play at ball ;
And wager deep, to thus enhance,
As e'er the case, in games of chance,
 The zeal of all.

The barracks formed a spacious square,
And then a guard was stationed there,
 To check surprise ;
For yet the Indian, wild and bold,
Sought oftentimes, we have been told,
 In vain to rise.

For records of the Mission tell How once he boldly did rebel Against the Crown ;
And, fearless, sought to drive away
The royal corps which then held sway
 Within the town;

When all the troop of mounted horse
Was prompt despatched, in ample force,
 And valiant led ;
That marching up the Mission hill,
So charged, with truly martial skill,
 The Indians fled.

Just then, howe'er, in merry peals,
The Parish bell loud toll'd for meals,
 When ceased the fight ;
And special orders to retreat
Were followed up with zeal replete
 And eager flight.

The dinner o'er, the troop returned,
To find the Mission sacked and burned,
 And Indians gone ;
And so with this a victory claimed,
With ne'er a horse or soldier maimed
 Throughout the morn.

In these rude times, when fearless came Those gallant knights of brilliant fame,
 From Castile's lands ;
When Christian conquest yet was young,
And converts rare were made among The savage bands—

Came one, who vowed to faithful serve,¹⁷
With holy zeal and steadfast nerve,
 The righteous cause ;
And ever constant to fulfill The mandate of his monarch's will,
 His creed and laws.

Which vow, with firmness he observed,
And from it ne'er had even swerved,
 In thought or way ;
And faithful to his liege command,
Amidst the trials of the land,
 He did not stray.

As chieftain, friend or private cit.,
In grand concourse, or scenes of wit,
 His talent shone ;
And bounteous to the needy poor,
To all he gave, who sought his door
 Their wants to moan.

As Christian, sure the church can claim But few who bore so fair a name
 Within its fold ;
And long her prayers will cease to flow
Ere she forgets to justly show
 These facts of old.

And as he lived, he calmly died,
His country's friend—his people's pride,
 And is no more ;
Yet "Guerra's" name shall lasting stand,
A record of his long-loved land,
 Till Time is o'er.

Among the isles that skirt the shore,¹⁸
Was one oft sought in days of yore
 For pelts and oil ;
Till constant raids of hunters there Quite left them stripp'd and almost bare
 Of all such spoil.

'T is said that once a feud they made,
And 'gainst the native bared the blade
 In bloody fight ;
When death's destruction proved the end Of nearly all who would defend Their homes and right.

Indeed, the Russian Codiack
An onslaught made that long did rack
 The public mind ;
As sadly told, the tidings went,
And o'er the wide-spread world were sent To tell mankind.

In modern times, some sportsmen sought
This self-same spot for rural sport
 And hunting cheer ;
When, strolling o'er the dreary shore,
They spied a group, which fled before
 With haste and fear.

Amazed, the sportsmen gave it chase,
And followed up a toilsome race
 Along the strand ;
Until, within a half-hid nook,
The fugitives were overtook,
 And bade to stand.

One aged chief of humble mien,
With three rude dames, one, scarce sixteen,
 The group combined ;
Who, crouching low upon the sand,
Obeyed at once the stern command,
 With hearts resigned.

Their fears howe'er were quickly quelled,
And dread of harm was soon dispelled
 By change to glee ;
For, uncontrolled, they did consent
Their home to leave, with heart's content,
 And cross the sea.

So anxious now to reach the main,
The party sought the launch to gain
 Ere closed the day;
But on the way, as blithe they went,
The elder matron did relent
 And stole away.

They sailed howe'er, and left her there Alone, her gloomy fate to bear,
 Though 't was unkind;
And rolling o'er the swelling sea
Their little bark sped onward free
 Before the wind.

Unharm'd, they passed the channel o'er
And reached e'er morn, their destined shore, San Pedro bay;
When landed safe, upon the beach
They soon set off, the town to reach
 Without delay.

'T is quite enough for us to say,
They reached the town, and spent each day
 In festal glee ;
But rash excess, and change of fare,
For these rude dames so free to share,
 Did not agree.

Alas ! they died and left behind
The poor old chief, whose care-worn mind
 Ne'er ceased to mourn ;
Who, wandering sad from place to place,
At length was missed, without a trace,
 To tell where gone.

As time went by, he was forgot,
Till accident revealed the spot
 Beside the shore ;
Where, crush'd with sorrow, he had strayed,
And there, a maniac, betrayed
 The grief he bore.

Lo ! there he sat from day to day,
E'er gazing o'er the channel way,
 Perchance to gain
A glimpse of home beyond the sea —
Of that lone isle, where once so free,
 He lord did reign.

But fate decreed he never more,
Should know again that cherished shore
 His heart did crave ;
For on the deep one morn was found
His floating corse, with sea-birds crown'd,
 That told his grave.

'T was thought, whilst gazing on the deep,
Stretch'd on the cliff, he went to sleep
 Too near its side ;
And dreaming of that long-loved isle,
With on his lips perhaps a smile,
 He fell and died.

The end was thus of poor "Black Hawk,"
Of whom the tourists oft may talk,
 And tell a tale ;
And drop a tear, in memory, too,
For him and those who e'er did rue
 Their vent'rous sail.

Some eighteen years had rolled away,
Since that eventful, doleful day
 We here recall ;
When she, who on the isle remained,
Was hither brought, and entertained
 With warmth by all.

The change, howe'er its mischief wrought,
And soon 't was known she here was brought To sink and die ;
For human kindness could not save
This lone and last one from the grave
 Where she doth lie.

PREAMBLE V.

With a parting salute, we are soon underway,
O'er the ocean again, now to roam ;
Where its frolicsome billows unceasingly play, .
As they scatter around us their foam.

And as we steam onward, we view with delight,
Where the mountains recede from the shore,
The evergreen gardens fresh, blooming and bright,
With their little blanch'd cabins before.

'Tis "La Carpentaria," and the famous "Rincon,"
Both a nice little drive from
the town ;
Where many a fête hath imparted a tone,
And success to their name and renown.

So that parties oft visit their shores to obtain
When the waters flow back from the land,
A repast from the mussels its shallows contain,
And that cling to the rocks on the sand.

A few leagues beyond this, we see near the shore,
What remains of a once thrifty
Mission ;
Disclosing now ruins, where grand structures before, Paraded in fine exhibition.

Alas ! all such stations are fading
away,
As their wealth and their power have gone ;
And sad is the picture their relics portray,
Now crumbling to dust, and forlorn.

On our right stands the island called “ Anacapa,” A mere cluster of rocks, and no more ;
Where the “ Scott ” laid her timbers, within a deep gap,
As she went with a crash on the shore.

Anon, like a cloud, rising up from the mist,
Far away in the distance
appear,
San Pedro's rude hillocks, whose features enlist
A distrust in their shelter and cheer.

But gliding along we soon enter
the bay,
Running close within hail of
the land,
And ere the ship's anchor rests fast in the clay,
Her freight agent from shore, is on hand.

Who, ever efficient, is ever prepared For his patrons, whenever they call ;
And his coaches are decent and nicely repaired,
With comfort and roomage for all.

So, taking our leave of the captain, we pass
To the lighter, which takes us
 away ;
Yet not, till together, we join in a glass,
And first drink to his health, as they say.

For who did not fancy Tom Seely as skip,
Or as friend and companion on shore ;
For a more genial sailor ne'er handled a ship,
Nor traversed the ocean
before.

At length, having landed, we scale the bluff-way, Excavated adroitly with care ;
When a Postal politely invites us to pay
At a station, near by, the coach fare.

But time will permit us without much delay,
A slight glance at the neighboring shore ;
So we'll glean what we can of its charms, while we may,
To append to the Past, as before.

SAN PEDRO.

CANTO V.

Lone, cheerless spot, and desert shore,
Where surges roll, and ceaseless roar,
 So dull and drear ;
Whose hills reach far beyond the sight,
Till fading, like the evening light,
 They disappear.

Lo ! there San Juan's tall peaks arise, Upheaving toward the lofty skies,
 And crown'd with snow ;
Whilst prairies green that intervene,
Make up the grandeur of the scene,
 Which lies below.

The time was once, when o'er this space,
Like little dots, the eye might trace,
 O'er vale and mound
The countless herds of grazing stock,
Upon a soil, where ne'er a rock Disturbed the ground.

And roaming wild, might then be seen,
In playful mood, and lively mien,
 The gallant steed ;
Who, o'er the plains would swiftly bound,
And sniff the air, as o'er the ground
 He pranced with speed.

And then the creek within the bay,
A sight revealed, from day to day,
 The eye to please ;
Of drowsy seals, in scattered bands,
Whose thousands basked upon the sands
 In tranquil ease.

III

A rugged ridge called "Dead Man's Isle,"
Was oft the spot where they did pile E'en to its top ;
And lying there, stretched in the sun,
Till thorough dried, they one by one Would downward drop.

When quite alive would be the sea,
As round the isle unchecked and free
 They sportive bayed ;
Whose barking sounds did loud resound
Within the Port, for miles around,
 As there they played.

For then, as monarchs of the bay,
These creatures held unbroken sway
 With naught to fear ;
Till came a roving, murd'rous band,
Whose galley, coasting near the land,
 Sought shelter here.

When fierce destruction then began,
That ended not till savage man
 Had laid them waste ;
And now 't is rare that one appears,
Unless compelled by modern fears
 From harm to haste.

At length some zealous trader sought To barter here, the goods he brought With wonted cheer ;
And oped a trade for after age
To follow up, and duly wage
 From year to year.

For then throughout this far-famed coast
San Pedro's Port could proudly boast
 The largest trade ;
And greatest share of exports, too ,
Of hides and pelts, with furs a few,
 That then were made.

PREAMBLE VI.

Now the coaches were waiting for orders to start,
With their horses quite prancing
and gay ;
So we scarcely get seated, ere bounding we part
And are racing along the highway.

The reason for haste is, the public well know, They're running a strong competition ;
And speed is their maxim, wherever they go,
To outrival and beat opposition.

So fleet do we travel, we soon reach the plains,
More or less than ten leagues from the sea ;
When the distance before us most cheerfully waned,
As we chit-chat so friendly
 and free.

A loquacious gent, half reclined on his seat,
Ever anxious the Yankees to bore,
Related the tale of an ill-timed retreat,
Which occurred in the Mexican War.

'T was the one that recounts how the Yankees, one day,
In their zeal and fresh hope for
 renown,
From their war-ship fierce landed in battle array,
And set off to lay siege to
 the town.

Their forces, he told us, were met on the way,
By a squadron of native dragoons,
Who, well mounted on chargers both prancing and gay,
Were advancing in gallant platoons.

A little brass cannon much glory did gain
As it mowed down the ranks of their foe ;
And forced it to turn and fall back on the plain Far away from disaster and woe.

The gist of the tale is, when the Yankees retired,
In disordered retreat from the field ;
The natives down-hearted, their last shot had fired,
And were only just ready to yield.

The story so given, spread laughter
 around,
As the gent it with mirth did unfold ;
And we thought, if 't were truthful, it certainly crown'd
All the feats of the war that are told.

Had the Yankees continued their march for the town, Without care for any collision,
They might have succeeded and gained a renown,
Instead of this slur of derision.

Ascending a rising, distinctly we saw,
For some leagues the fine country
around,
With its lofty dark mountains that shoot up before,
And its prairies where cattle
abound.

A glimpse, too, we had, of the nice little town, Though partially hid by the trees,
Where its gardens and vineyards of well-known renown,
 So adorn it, and charmingly please.

The summit descended, we race o'er the ground,
 Now so level and smooth as it lay ;
On each side the bright flowers, fresh blooming around,
 Adding charm to the scenes on the way.

In the Spring of the year the whole country abounds
In its flowers, the choicest of hue,
When scarce then a spot can be found o'er its grounds,
But a garden presents to to the view.

A short distance further, brings us safe into town,
Where we halt at the house of a friend,
And alighting, rejoice, as we quickly leap down,
That we've got to our long journey's end.

LOS ANGELES.

CANTO VI.

“ El Pueblo de los Angeles,” Indeed the town of Angels is,
Of beauty rare ;
And t' is a spot that gives delight,
That fills the soul with rapture bright
And visions fair !

Its walks, its rides, its hills and dales,
Its grassy plains, and fertile vales,
With flowers bloom,
Whose blossoms bright, sweet odors rise,
And fragrant greet the fust'ring skies
In rich perfume.

What joy ! what gay content was here,
With scenes so chaste, and charms so dear,
 'Mong hearts so free ;
When irksome toil, and gloomy care
Gave place to pleasure everywhere
 In mirth and glee !

With homes thus blest, their wants were few,
Of things abroad, they scarcely knew,
 Or gave a thought ;
But well content with what they had,
They ask'd no more their hearts to glad,
 Nor wished for aught.

For with a clime so soft and mild
They lived along, from care beguiled,
 In constant health ;
Their grazing flocks on every side.
Enhancing e'er their worldly pride,
 And source of wealth.

Thus time went by, from day to day,
In social sport and constant play,
 With song and dance ;
From twilight eve 'till early dawn,
Within the cot, or on the lawn,
 In blissful trance.

And on some special gala day,
Then hundreds came from far away
 To join its cheer ;
When old and young would, mounted, dare
To taunt the bull, or savage bear, Devoid of fear.

So, deck'd in all their gayest pride,
Each horseman bold did gallant ride
 With dext'rous skill ;
And there before his love display
Such feats that naught could him repay, Save her good-will.

But woe to him, from his adored
If by mischance his horse got gored,
Or he got thrown ;
For either fault would quite suffice
To cause dismissal in a trice
With scornful frown.

'T was rare howe'er, or scarce was heard,
That such mishap had e'er occurred
To man or horse ;
For o'er the world from East to West,
As riders they were deemed the best,
On turf or course.

The children, too, could famous ride,
And three or four would sometimes stride
A gallant steed ;
The youngest in the middle placed,
When o'er the town they wildly raced,
With scarce a heed.

But ah ! alas, such times have fled,
And though grand wealth now reigns instead
 To comfort life ;
Yet, with the change, untimely came A host of rogues, whose vicious fame Brought constant strife.

For here they found a home for vice Wherein to sow with cards and dice
 Their venomed deeds ;
Among a race who rude withal Too easy bent to mischief's call
 And grasped its seeds.

But later, theft and murder came,
Both followed up with equal fame
 From time to time ;
Till scarce a day, but three or four Were murdered found, and sometimes more,
 By growth of crime.

For such a vile and noxious set
Of midnight thieves, was never met
 The world around ;
And cut-throats, too, who dealt in blood,
Whose fiendish acts, alas, did flood
 And steep the ground.

They were "Sonora's" vilest fruits,
And direst pests, that, like fierce brutes,
 On blood would feast ;
Whose dreadful crimes have scarcely left
A home extant, that's not bereft
 Of friends, at least.

But, as the time at length progressed,
Such fiendish acts were prompt suppressed
 By strength of arm ;
When "Sonorensic" malice fled
And left its haunts with anxious dread
 And wild alarm.

Since which these lands, thus purg'd of crime,
Have merit gained from time to time
 As culture came ;
And now, indeed, for leagues around,
With labor rife, are thriving found
 And have great fame.

Far o'er the hills, we may behold,
Still central in its open wold
 A remnant yet
Of olden time, whose blighted fame
And sad decline must surely claim
 The world's regret.

For there once stood a grand domain ¹⁹
Within its wide-spread fertile plain Like some proud queen ;
With garden groves and vineyards fair
Whose varied fruits, both choice and rare,
 Were charming seen.

But like its consorts in the State,
She too, has shared the grievous fate
 They sadly bore ;
And thus her Indian convert here, Compelled by want to disappear,
 Is seen no more.

An index sad, of modern days,
Which serves to prove in many ways
 The maxim true ;
That where the Saxon foot doth go,
It carries with it waste and woe
 For them to rue.

But ah ! indeed, 't is Nature's course
The ever-certain, willful source Whence comes the blow ;
And is the destined fate they bear
Which human aid can ne'er repair
 Nor stay its woe.

For culture must enforce its way,
With onward march from day to day
 Where rudeness lies ;
And so the Red Man, here to-day,
To modern progress must give way,
 Though thus he dies !

P R E A M B L E V I I .

But let us return to the town's merry haunts
And its scenes ever happy
 and gay ;
Where there's comfort and pastime to gladden the wants Of the trav'ler who ventures this way.

Beside the bright eye of the native brunette,
 That out-dazzles the gems she may wear,
There is love in the Pike's to tease and to fret,
And a mildness to soften dull care.

There are vineyards and orchards and gardens and fields That embellish the village
 around ;
With the sweetest of grape that abundantly yields
And other choice fruits that abound.

The roads through the suburbs are charming indeed,
With their little scant streams on each side,
Where the bright verdant hedges though covered with weed, Add much to their fame far and wide.

The country surrounding has greatly progressed, Giving life to its precincts
 around ;
And the Mormon intrusion, so lately suppressed
Doth now with attraction abound.

There's the range of Santana, and vale of San Juan, Far away from the skirts of
the town,
So thriving with plenty, they must be anon
Grand places of wealth and renown.

In fact, the whole country is blessed with success,
And its people are happy
and gay,
For, without molestations to grieve and oppress,
They have nothing to hamper their way.

So thus we will leave them and haste to the strand, Once again to resume from the sea
A view of the sights which encompass
the land
And give vim to their charms, gay
and free.

Suffice it, that safe we arrive at the bay,
Where the steamer lies ready to part ;
So quickly embarking, we are prompt
under way,
With a speed that gives joy to the heart.

For soon, the bold bluff of " Point Loma " appears,
As the hill of " San Pedro " grows dim,
With the coast line so near us, that often with cheers,
We are hailed by the groups on its brim.

These greetings so cheerful, were all that we met,
To attract and divert on
the way ;
And yet their dull sameness gave naught to regret,
For with music, we pass'd off
the day.

At length a bell warned us of something at hand,
And the steamer soon slackened her way ;
So we hied to the deck, whence we saw
'twas the land,
Whose surroundings we came to survey.

SAN DIEGO.

CANTO VII.

All hail, most blest and sacred spot,²⁰
On which it was famed Serra's lot, Rome's cross to raise ;
And on a lonesome, dreary strand,
To consecrate, with hallowed hand,
 The Host we praise !

For there, his first "Grand Mass" was said,
In offering to the great God-head,
 His work to bless,
That by God's holy will decreed
The Christian conquest might proceed With true success.

And there it was, he first began
To soothe the ways of Pagan man,
 A savage race ;
Yet ah ! what dangers did he dare
Their hearts to tame, so they might share
 The convert's grace.

What wants, what cares and risks he bore !
An exile to this heathen shore
 Where darkness lay ;
With naught to cheer or charm the mind,
Nor e'en a shelter from the wind,
 To smooth his way.

And yet, withal, he faltered not,
But with a will that's not forgot,
 Urged on his way ;
By smiles and gifts and friendly bribes,
That gained him ground among the tribes
 From day to day.

Till, by degrees, his station grew,
As eager round it, converts drew
 To join his creed ;
And with it learn, though rudely taught,
Such useful arts, as he best thought
 They most did need.

By which their huts were better framed,
Their lands were tilled and flocks were tamed O'er vale and hill ;
And many a fabric yet doth stand
A leading wonder in the land
 To prove their skill.

As time elapsed and years passed o'er,
At length arose upon the shore
 A little town ;
Whose modest structures scattered round
Were sheltered 'neath a fortress mound
 Of old renown.

And one, the most imposing seen,²¹
Of plain design and humble mien,
 We will portray ;
For there a wealthy Don did dwell
Whose heart, the living town can tell,
 Was kind and gay.

Where scarce a night, but dance and song
The fleeting hours did chase along
 In mirth and glee ;
When old and young, from far and wide,
E'er gathered round, on every side,
 The sport to see.

For always free these pastimes were To rich and poor, who chose to share
 The social call ;
When gaily dressed, both prompt would hie
Each other's grace and charms to vie
 At every ball.

And there would grace and beauty meet Their nets to spread, some swain to cheat Whose heart was bland ;
And gaily lead him on to love,
As round the hall they brisk did move,
 Joined hand in hand.

But of the beauty then in town,
None could compare, we sure must own,
 Throughout the land,
With that which graced our friend's domain,
Whose gentle sweetness e'er did gain
 All hearts command.

And who that now recalls those nights,
Those ever-charming, joyous sights,
 The peasants' balm,—
But feels a sadness on his brow,
That such delights no longer now
 Are here to charm.

They have dispersed ! A stranger's sway Such rural treats has swept away
 And left behind
A blank instead, with naught to please,
A gloomy scene, to chill and freeze
 The gaysome mind.

Two humble dwellings, side by side²²
That stood for years the village pride
 Are standing now,
In which two gallant sailors dwelt Whose hearts in friendship ever felt A kindred glow.

Like brothers they were bound in love,
And in their acts each zealous strove
 His love to vie,
That bated not, nor even waived
Through all the changes they had braved Till both did die.

And as they lived, so since they died
They have been neighbors side by side,
 And tenants are Within a ruin'd church-yard laid Where many a kith and kin have strayed
 To lisp a prayer.

Two simple slabs, their names impart
That tell the day they did depart
 This world's career ;
And he who stops to read the fact
Will breathe a sigh while in the act,
 And drop a tear.

Not far beyond, upon a green,
A simple structure may be seen,
 With latticed fence,
Where lie reposed, those valiant men Who lost their lives within a glen Some leagues from hence.

Poor victims of an oversight
Which history claims as something bright
 And worthy fame,
Though here 'twas deemed a foul defeat,
And caused by leaders incomplete,
 Who were to blame.

At least, 'tis said by those who know
That ere was struck the fatal blow,
 Had order reigned,
The battle lost, might have been won,
And they, the victors, made to run
 The field so stained.

But let this pass ! Come view the strand
On which the Pioneers did land
 In days of yore ;
That modern progress scarce has changed In aught that then around it ranged And cheered the shore.

A row of wooden shanties stand Upon the margin of the land Along the beach ;
Where here and there, some launch or hulk
Makes up the vision seen in bulk,
 Within our reach.

'Twas here the early trader brought The produce he with patience sought
 From mart to mart,
That long lay stored with zealous care,
Until for home he did prepare.
 With gladsome heart.

Then truly 'twas a busy sight
To see the strand from morn till night Alive with cheer !
For when a ship was homeward bound,
What merry shouts did then resound Afar and near !

Beyond these sights we thus portray
A rustic fort preserves the bay
 Secure and free,
From outward foes and contraband,
That oftentimes disturb the land
 And neighboring sea.

And so with this the past is told—
Whose early days and times of gold
 Have had their charm;
Yet ere we part we fain would crave
The Critic's friendly aid to save Our Muse from harm.

NOTES.

(1) The rivers of Sacramento and San Joaquin, whose twin-like streams, side by side, uniting at their mouths, created Suisun Bay, and passing through the Straits of Carquinez into the magnificent basin of San Pablo formed a copartnership with that of San Francisco, and finally passed out through the Golden Gate into the deep bosom of the Pacific Ocean. It has been said by the early historical writers that the bay of San Francisco originally extended far south over the valley of San Jose toward the Tulares, hence the legend of the aborigines describing a lake of grand dimensions, whose waters escaped through an opening created by some unknown revulsion of nature.

(2) The writer alludes to that band of holy missionaries, headed by their venerated president, Friar Junipero Serra, who, under the auspices and protection of the Spanish Government, in 1775, commenced their great work of Christianizing and civilizing the numerous tribes of Indians then inhabiting the northern portion of California,—that is, from San Diego north—at this period a region almost entirely unknown to the civilized world.

(3) Foreign trade was almost exclusively American, confined to trading ships from Boston, Mass., principally by the mercantile houses of Bryant & Sturgis and William Appleton & Co., who, for twenty years, engrossed the entire trade, with the exception of a few outside adventurers, with an occasional ship, also, from Lima, and now and then an expedition from the Sandwich Islands.

(4) General John A. Sutter, a Swiss gentleman, came to this country in 1839, and soon after his arrival, by permission of the local authorities at Monterey, he established a trading post not far from the present city of Sacramento, which served as a kind of frontier protection to the newly acquired ranchos of the north, which had suffered much from depredations of the unfriendly Indians. By his activity and good management he drew around him a sufficient force of the friendly natives to enable him to erect his grand stronghold, called Sutter's Fort, which held quite a formidable position at the commencement of the war between Mexico and the United States. At this period he made himself serviceable on many occasions to the United States Government, which was duly acknowledged by the authorities in Washington.

(5) The war alluded to was the one between Mexico and the United States, which culminated by the acquisition and annexation of California to the latter, by right of conquest and purchase.

(6) It was the wide-famed Vigilance Committee, so talked of, pro and con, whose acts, though illegal, were successful in ridding the land of a pest of scoundrels and villains who infested it and bade defiance to its laws and authorities.

(7) The residence of Jacob P. Leese, who came to this country overland, via New Mexico, and reached Los Angeles December, 1833, where he took up his residence for a short time, and then proceeded north to San Francisco, where he married Miss Rosalia Vallejo. After the change of government, in 1849, he went to Monterey, since which his family has made that place its permanent home.

(8) Captain William A. Leidesdorff came to this country as Master of the schooner Juliana, owned by John Coffin Jones, Esq., a resident of Santa Barbara, and reached here in June, 1841. Some time afterward he resigned his commission and took up his residence in San Francisco, where he remained until his death, in 1848.

(9) William D. M. Howard arrived here in 1839 on board the ship California (Captain Arthur), and soon after, by permission, he left the ship at San Pedro and took up his residence with Don Abel Stearns, then a merchant in Los Angeles. He went home to the United States, via Mexico, in 1840, and returned again to this coast in 1842 as assistant supercargo with Captain Arthur on board the ship California, under the patronage of the house of B. T. Read & Co., of Boston. He continued to receive occasional consignments for several years from his friends in Boston, making San Francisco his headquarters, when, in 1849, he made a visit East to his native land, where he became sick, and soon returned to California to die in his princely residence at San Mateo, and was buried in the little stone chapel to which he had so liberally contributed toward its construction.

(10) William H. Aspinwall, who was the first to introduce steam navigation on the Northern Pacific Coast, having contracted with the Government at Washington for the transportation of the U. S. mail across the Isthmus of Panama, thence by water to San Francisco by a line of steamers, the first of which, the California, reached her destination in February, 1849.

(11) Nathan Spear first visited this coast from the Sandwich Islands in 1823, and some years afterward he came to Monterey, where he remained but a short time, and then proceeded to San Francisco, where he located permanently. His place of business was on the corner of Montgomery and Clay streets.

(12) John Vioget came to this country in 1837 and located in San Francisco, where he kept a billiard and drinking saloon on Clay street, about half way between Montgomery and Kearny streets. He was a surveyor by profession, and laid out the original plan of San Francisco, extending to Market street. He was from one of the old towns in Switzerland, which probably accounts for the narrow and contracted character of many of the streets so common here.

(13) This was the residence of La Señora Briones, who, in olden times, as a favor did all the washing required by the numerous vessels that visited la Yerba Buena, for which, at that period, the now called North Beach bore the cognomen of "Washerwoman's Bay."

(14) This was a patriot vessel-of-war, under command of one Buchard, who, after his departure from Monterey, proceeded southward and anchored off the Refugio Rancho, located about half way between Point Concepcion and the Presidio of Santa Barbara, where a force landed and destroyed almost entirely the little settlement which they found there, and then continued on their course south, until they reached La Mission de San Juan Capistrano. Here they disembarked a force which, after ransacking and damaging to some considerable extent, and consuming the wine and little niceties of the old Friars, they returned to their ship in good time to escape being made prisoners by an armed force, which had been sent up from San Diego to protect the Mission.

(15) Padre Junipero Serra, President of the Missionary Department, who died in Monterey and was buried at Carmelo, where, for a long period, the place of his interment was unknown. Recently, however, proofs were ascertained of its locality, and means were taken to substantiate the fact by further investigations, which were successful.

(16) Gen. John C. Fremont came to this country in 1846 as the "Pathfinder," and his first movement was in favor of declaring California independent, and took part in what was called the raising of the Bear Flag in Sonoma. He was prominent in many of the subsequent difficulties which occurred here, until at length they subsided from the entire subjection of the country to the American forces. After the declaration of peace and the admission of California into the Union as a State, he and the Hon. William M. Gwin were elected the first representatives to the Government at Washington. In his intercourse with the native Californians he made himself popular, and they would have been glad to have had him successful in his attempt at Sonoma to establish a free and independent government.

(17) Don José de la Guerra, an native of Novales, Spain, who came to the City of Mexico, and there entered the service of the Government of Spain as a lieutenant, and came to this country in 1802. He was stationed at Monterey, and afterward appointed Comandante of the Presidio at Santa Barbara. Subsequently he was elected to represent California in the Congress of Mexico, to which place he repaired, where he arrived too late to take his seat, as it had already been taken by his suplente, so he returned and resumed his position as Comandante, which he retained for some years, when he retired to private life.

(18) The Island of San Nicholas, which, like its neighboring isles, was once populated, until, from frequent disturbances by the hordes of Russian Codiacks, the islanders were induced to abandon their homes and seek protection on the mainland.

(19) The Mission of San Gabriel that stands in the center of the grand valley of Santa Anita, and the most fertile portion of Los Angeles county.

(20) The reverend Friar, Junipero Serra, who headed a band of missionaries to this coast in the year 1769, when he commenced his grand work of subjecting and Christianizing the rude Indian race of California. He located his first Mission at this place, afterward increased by a chain of missionary posts, twenty in number, extending to the northern shores of San Pablo Bay, gathering around them a crude population of from fifteen to twenty thousand Indians, which, under the direction and guidance of their spiritual fathers, were taught the most useful requirements. Some were carpenters, some were blacksmiths, others saddlers and shoemakers, and herders of the vast numbers of cattle, which, in course of time, accumulated to hundreds of thousands. The female department was taught spinning and weaving, and all the necessary requirements of household economy, so that they lived along a life of contentment and ease, with rarely a case of insubordination.

(21) Don Juan Bandini, who came to this country from Lima, with his father, who was an Italian by birth, and who had commanded a Spanish ship-of-war in early days. Don Juan, from his urbanity and pleasing manners, was very popular, and had always taken an active part in the interests of California, having represented her in the halls of the Monte-zumás. His descendants were numerous, and were celebrated everywhere for their beauty and attractive manners.

(22) Captain Henry D. Fitch and Joseph Snooks, both were captains of ships plying between this coast and Lima. The former was an American, who came here in early days, a native of New Hampshire, and the latter was a European, who had resided many years on the South American coast.
